Research article

“You can’t do that; they’ll throw the cooking pot at you!” A qualitative study of healthcare providers’ attitudes toward assisted partner notification for people with HIV in Indonesia

BMC Health Services Research

Abstract: Background: Assisted partner notification (APN) is recommended as a public health strategy to increase HIV testing in people exposed to HIV. Yet its adoption globally remains at an early stage. This qualitative study sought the opinions of HIV health service providers regarding the appropriateness and feasibility of implementing APN in Indonesia where such services are on the cusp of adoption. Methods: Focus group discussions were held with 40 health service providers to consider APN as an innovative concept and to share their reactions regarding its potential implementation in Indonesia. Voice-recorded discussions were conducted in Bahasa, transcribed verbatim, and analyzed. Results: Participants recognized APN’s potential in contacting and informing the partners of HIV-positive clients of possible viral exposure. They also perceived APN’s value as a client-driven service permitting clients to select which of three partner notification methods would work best for them across differing partner relationships and settings. Nonetheless, participants also identified personal and health system challenges that could impede successful APN adoption including medical and human resource limitations, the need for specialized APN training, ethical and equity considerations, and lack of sufficient clarity concerning laws and government policies regulating 3rd party disclosures. They also pointed to the job-overload, stress, personal discomfort, and the ethical uncertainty that providers might experience in delivering APN. Conclusion: Overall, providers of HIV services embraced the concept of APN but forecast practical difficulties in key service areas where investments in resources and system change appeared necessary to ensure effective and equitable implementation.

Abstract

-the authors need to add setting of research as Indonesia is many provinces

Introduction

-the authors can add information about strong patriarchal systems in Indonesia and heterosexual hegemony. For instance, men who are bisexual or homosexual face pressures to get married to women, and may contract HIV through hidden, unsafe sex with other men.

Methods

Would you mind to add information about methodological orientation was stated to underpin the study? Which qualitative paradigm?

Do you do specific qualitative data analysis? Thematic analysis or content analysis or others? Please explain

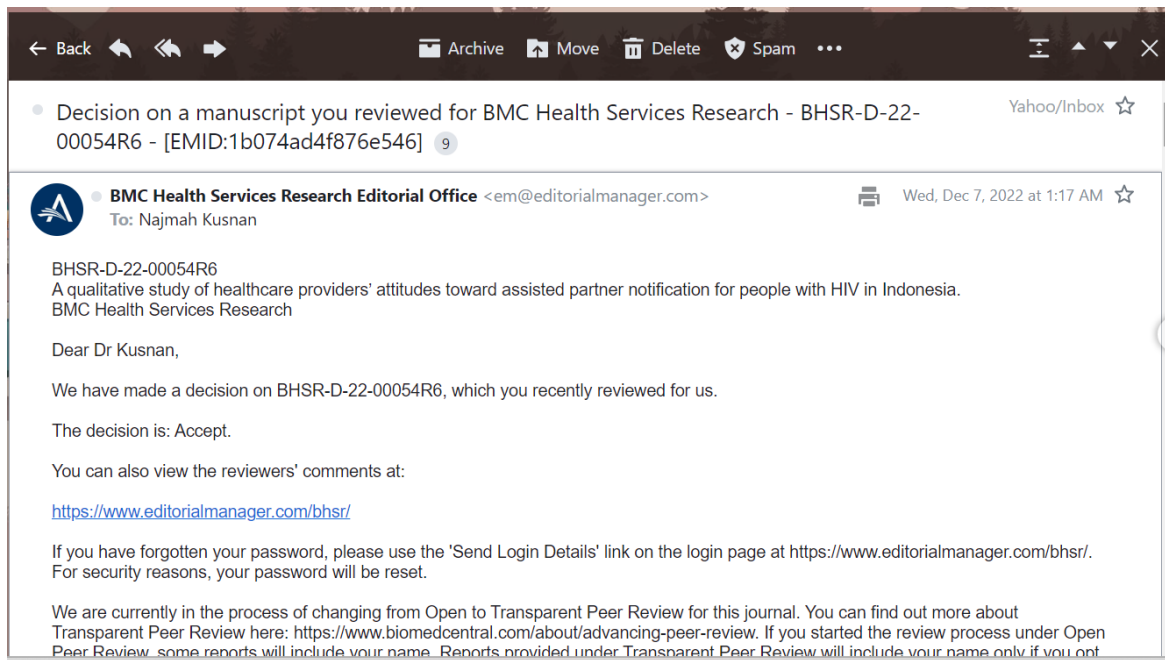

Do you do pilot project to test the questions in interview guidelines?

Results and Discussion;

We have some special idioms in Indonesian and may be difficult to literally translate in English, therefore if the authors need to translate to English, it is necessary to put in a bracket in Indonesian words

Such : You can't be a "bucket mouth" (mulut ember)
